Although more people have been getting married, the rate of divorce has increased. In the United States, nearly 50 percent of those who get married are getting divorced. This is a significant increase from the 1960s, when only about 10 percent of marriages ended in divorce. There are many reasons for this increase, including changes in social norms, economic factors, and the availability of legal resources. The rise in divorce rates has led to a growing body of research on the factors that contribute to marital breakdown. This research has identified a number of key factors, including communication problems, lack of emotional support, and financial stress. Understanding these factors can help couples to identify and address potential problems in their marriages, and may also inform the development of more effective interventions for couples in distress.
